Mrs. Stewart Anxious to Save His Body from Burial in the old-time tenement at the address DOZEN SHAKEN UP she had named in her advertisement She led him to a scrupulously clean, desperately poor little flat on the ground that was little more than a shaft. It was like living at a niche at the bottom of a well of the living of a well of the literature of the literature of a well of the literature of the literatu tom of a well. Sitting among her few little sticks of furniture and with her tear-swollen eyes turning constantly on a big chair that stood empty by the fire-nince, the woman told her

Had Heart Troubic.

"My husband," she said, "was John Stewart. He used to drive a wagon for Fleischmann, the baker, but his health broke down and he had to get easier work. The doctor said it was heart trouble, and told him he must take good care of himself. I wanted him to rest up awhile and let me go out and do housework and the likes of that, but he wouldn't hear to it. He said he was the bread-winner and that my place was at home. That was just like-John.

"Well, he got a job carrying samples for Mr. Lederer, the jeweller, at No.

that is to be desirable this season, together with all the favored standards, we have inaugurated this week the greatest selling this store has known in a year. In fact, this sale is really the anniversary of the one of a year ago, except that in several instances, this time we are able to offer even better values.

We have consummated some of the biggest purchases ever known to the trade—because of over-production. The prices quoted below speak for themselves. They will certainly tend to largely augment the great volume of silk business we already do.
